About National Geographic Photo Camp

National Geographic Photo Camp is a series of photography workshops for youth from communities in and outside the United States. The U.S. Embassy, in partnership with the Barbados Museum and Historical Society, Barbados Defense Force, Regional Security Service, other local sponsors and the National Geographic's Mission Programs organized and hosted a Photo Camp for Barbadian youth March 27 – 31, 2010.

The National Geographic Photo Camp inspired young Barbadians to explore their communities through the camera's lens and to share their vision through public presentations and exhibitions. The images taken by young Barbadian photographers will be used as catalysts for discussion about the challenges facing their communities, their relationship with and impact on the environment, and their hopes for the future. National Geographic Photo Camp has reached over 15 million viewers through media coverage in such publications as the National Geographic Magazine, CNN, the Miami Herald, and the San Francisco Chronicle. Exhibitions of students' work have been held around the world from London and New Orleans to Udaipur, India.

This internationally recognized project will have a profound impact not only on the young students who participated, but will also showcase Barbados' tremendous natural beauty and resources to a global audience.
